

The Daily Courant.

Thursday, April 26. 1705.

London, April 26.

WHAT follows is Part of a Sermon, preach'd at Versailles, before the King of France, the 13th of February last, N. S. being the Feast of the Purification of the Virgin, by Father Gaillard a Jesuite. It is Translated from the Original, Printed at Paris with the King's Privilege, and transmitt'd hither very lately from Holland. Having inform'd the Publick, by what sort of a Priest, and to what sort of a King, it was spoken; we leave it to their Reflection.

After he had in general prais'd the King's Piety, and other Christian Virtues, he address'd the following Wcrds to his Majesty. What imports it to the Good of a People and the Happyness of their Lives, that their Prince extends the Limits of his Empire beyond his Enemy's Countries: That he makes their Dominions Provinces of his Kingdom: That he be Superior to them in Sieges and Battles: That Nations combine together to defend themselves, and stop his Progres? That their Monarch has the Comfort to see Princes his Grand-Children support or encrease his good Fortune, follow the August Steps of their victorious Father, and imitate his Goodness, his Docility, his Equity, his Vigilance, and his Intrepidity; if anxious and uneasy a Man live under Oppression; if while secure from the Enemy's Incursions, he walk the Streets in Danger of an Assassin's Sword; and be less afraid in the Night of being rob'd or murther'd in Woods and Forrests, than in the Midst of a Town; if weak and Friendless, he must suffer Jujuries from a rich powerful Neighbour, and if less provision was made to do him Justice against such Violences; if he have not about him so many Masters, and those excellent, to teach his Children Arts and Sciences, by which they might one Day make their Fortune; and if by the good Order the Prince has establish'd, he be not as well satisfied with his Condition, as the Virtues of the Prince give him Cause to be with his own. Under a very great King, those who have the principal Employments, find no Difficulties in the Discharge of their Duty: He is the Spring of all. His Authority and his Genius smooth their Way, and remove all Obstructions. How many Gifts of Heaven must a Prince have to govern well? An august Birth, An Air of Empire and Authority, a Face that satisfies the Curiosity of the People that crowd to see him, and keeps the Counties within Respect: He must be easy and insinuating in his Discourse & Carrage; his Heart must be open and sincere, and such as Men may believe they see to the Bottom of, and therefore very proper to gain him Friends, Creatures, and Allies: his Motives and Designs ought always to be profound and impenetrable; 'tis necessary his Appearance in publick be serious and grave; his Manner of doing Favours must be such as doubly enhances them; the Extent of his Knowledge ought to be so great, as to enable him to see every thing by his own Eyes, and act immediately of himself: his Generals, tho' at Distance from him, must be but his Lieutenants; and his Ministers no more than Ministers. In a Word, such a Prince must know how to conquer and how to make the best Use of Victory; he must know how to regulate a vast Ambition, and be able to instruct his Children how far a Conqueror should go. These Admirable Virtues which every Man includes in the Idea he forms of a real Sovereign, are they any more than the natural Picture of the great Monarch of France? Do they not, SIR, paint your Majesty to the Life? And a Monarch, who like You, is endow'd with them all, does he not deserve the Name of G R E A T? Which all the Nations of Europe, even those who most earnestly wish your Destruction, have not been able to deny you, which you have obtain'd by the unanimous Consent of all Mankind, and which is more glorious, SIR, without your seeking it.
